private banks, which his grandfather had founded in 1860. He remained as a partner in the firm for a number of years.

It seemed to his family that Bill might remain a bachelor. But on August 6, 1937, at the age of 42, he surprised friends and relatives by marrying Almeda Broun in New York. Unfortunately, the marriage lasted only a half dozen years and ended in divorce. There were no children.

After his father's death in 1951, William retired from the banking business. Having adequate means, he traveled a great deal. During his journeys he met Laura Detwiller, and in 1955, at the age of 60, he married her. The Sowards settled in an apartment in Palm Beach, Florida, where they lived a quiet, pleasant life. Bill seemed at last to have found the life that satisfied him.

But, unhappily, Laura Sowards died in August of 1960, leaving Bill alone and lonely once again. Two years later, on July 4, 1962, he died suddenly, at the age of 67. With his death, a name that had distinguished the development of America passed into history.

From his youthful days as an ambulance driver, Bill Sowards had shown a deep desire to help others. Because of his innate shyness, the chances of fulfilling that desire during his lifetime seemed to be few. But his will provided him with the opportunity he sought to share with others the abundance that had been his. Perhaps it was a measure of his shyness that, although all in his family knew him as William H. Sowards IV, he used the less formal "Jr." in giving his name to his fund.

Cover: The Sowards House at Auburn, New York.
Note: No photograph of William H. Sowards IV was found available for publication.
In 1862, the will of William H. Seward Jr. established the William H. Seward, Jr. Fund to be administered by the New York Community Trust for charitable purposes.

In the town of Auburn, New York, amid the hills and valleys of the beautiful Finger Lakes, Dr. Samuel S. Seward built a home for his family in 1816. That house became the home of four generations of men who bore the distinguished name of Dr. Seward's famous son, William Henry Seward, Secretary of State in Abraham Lincoln’s cabinet and the man who negotiated for the purchase of Alaska by the United States.

The first paternal ancestor of the illustrious family to come to America was Obadiah Seward, who arrived during the reign of Queen Anne and settled in Chester, New York. A century later, the first William Henry Seward was born in 1801 in Florida, New York. At the age of nine he was sent to an academy in Goshen, New York, and by the time he was fifteen years old he was ready to enter college. It was at this time that his father built the family home at 33 South Street in Auburn.

William was sent to Union College in Schenectady, from which he graduated in 1820 with honors. After teaching for a year in the South, he moved to New York City, where he studied law. In 1822 he was admitted to the bar. William returned to Auburn and established a law partnership with Judge Elijah Miller. In 1824, the 23-year-old attorney married Judge Miller’s daughter, Frances.

While he worked hard at his practice, William soon showed an interest in politics and a flair for oratory. In 1830 he was elected to the state senate. Four years later he was defeated in his bid for the governorship of New York State, but in the next election, in 1838, the 37-year-old politician became New York’s eleventh governor.

Seward's political success continued. He was re-elected governor in 1840. Nine years later he was elected to the United States Senate, and in 1855 he was returned for a second term. In 1860 Seward was a candidate for the presidential nomination, but he was defeated in his bid by Abraham Lincoln. When Lincoln was elected, he made Seward his Secretary of State, a post which he held from 1861 to 1869.

Seward was known as an outspoken opponent of slavery.

At the time of Lincoln’s assassination in 1865, Seward, too, was marked for death. However, he had been thrown from his carriage not long before the attempt was made on his life, and the casts and bandages from the injuries he had sustained in that accident helped to save him from his attackers. Eventually Seward’s health and vigor returned, and under the administration of Lincoln’s successor, Andrew Johnson, Seward negotiated for the purchase of Alaska from Russia for a price of $7,200,000. At the time, the acquisition was castigated as “Seward’s Folly”; and he died in 1872 before Alaska had lived down that reputation.

William Henry Seward, Jr., had been born in the family home at Auburn in 1839 while his father was serving as governor of New York. He was the youngest of three sons. He received his education privately.
in Auburn and later studied in Washington, D.C. In 1860, at the age of 21, he married Janet M. Watson, and that same year he established the banking firm of William H. Seward & Co. But his career was soon interrupted by the outbreak of the Civil War. At the time of his enlistment in 1862, William was commissioned a lieutenant colonel of the 138th New York Volunteers. Later he was promoted to colonel. He was severely wounded at the battle of Monocacy, in Maryland. Cited for "having acted with rare gallantry," Seward was promoted to the rank of brigadier general in September of 1864. A short time later, his son, whom he named William Henry Seward III, was born in Auburn.

The young general resigned from the army in June of 1865 and returned to his home in Auburn, where he resumed his banking career. In addition to his own firm, he was a trustee of the Cayuga County Savings Bank. Although he had little of his father's interest in politics, he did serve as president of the New York Electoral College in 1888. He died in 1920 at the age of eighty.

William Henry Seward III, born on November 10, 1864, while his father was fighting in the Civil War, grew up in the family home in Auburn with his two sisters. In 1888 he graduated from Yale University with a B.A. degree. He remained at Yale to study law, was admitted to the New York bar in 1890, and in 1894 he entered the Auburn firm of Underwood, Storke, Seward & Elder. He remained with the firm until 1945, when he began an independent practice that continued until the end of his life.

In 1893, the year before he entered partnership, he married Anna Dennis Myers of Auburn. Two years later, on May 4, 1895, a son, their only child, was born. The proud parents, delighted at the continuation of the line for another generation, named him William Henry Seward IV.

In addition to the law, William Seward III enjoyed a career in banking. He joined his father's bank as a partner in 1891. In 1920 he was made a senior partner and president. He was also a trustee of the Auburn Savings Bank for half a century, from 1901 until 1951, and rose to the presidency by 1938. Active in public life as well, William Seward III served as trustee of the Auburn City Hospital and of the Seymour Library Association. He also arranged that, at the time of his death, Seward House, which had been the Seward family home for 135 years, would be opened to the general public. William Henry Seward III died in 1931 at the age of 87. The Seward House, which is open to the public today, is complete with furnishings and offers visitors a glimpse of 19th century American life.

"Signing the Alaska Treaty," by Emanuel Leutze, 1867.

Like his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, whose name he bore, William Henry Seward IV grew up in the family home on South Street. Bill was an only child, and from earliest childhood he seemed destined to spend much of his life alone. He grew to be a tall, good-looking young man, but he usually kept to himself. The fourth of a line of dynamic, gregarious men who distinguished themselves in politics, the military, banking, and law, young Bill had few of their outgoing qualities. Rather, he was a shy person who found social relationships difficult. But he did possess a great deal of courage and determination.

He was sent to St. Paul’s School in Concord, New Hampshire, to prepare for college, and in 1914 he entered Yale University. Interested in rowing, he became a member of the Freshman Crew and then went on to join the Sophomore Crew and, finally, the Varsity. To please his family, he joined a few organizations at Yale, and in his junior year he enrolled in the Reserve Officers Training Corps.

With a war going on in Europe, young Bill’s attentions were drawn away from studies and sports. In May, 1917, Seward enrolled as a volunteer with the Norton-Harjes Division of the American Red Cross Ambulance Corps. An emergency appendectomy kept him from leaving for Europe immediately, but the next month he was able to sail for France. During that summer and fall, he was in active service with Section 60, which distinguished itself in the big offensive known as the Second Battle of Verdun. He and all the members of Section 60 received citations from the French Army for the work they performed during the battle.

In November of 1917, Bill Seward returned to the United States to train for a commission. He rejoined his class at Yale and entered the Naval Training Unit. When he was rejected because of a slight physical impairment, he again left college and underwent corrective surgery. In the following spring, he enlisted in the Naval Auxiliary Reserve.

When the war ended, Bill decided not to return to Yale, where his class of 1918 had already graduated. Instead, he entered the banking business of William H. Seward & Co., one of the country’s last private banks, which his grandfather had founded in 1860. He remained as a partner in the firm for a number of years.

It seemed to his family that Bill might remain a bachelor. But on August 6, 1937, at the age of 42, he surprised friends and relatives by marrying Almeda Bown in New York. Unfortunately, the marriage lasted only a half dozen years and ended in divorce. There were no children.

After his father's death in 1951, William retired from the banking business. Having adequate means, he traveled a great deal. During his journeys he met Laura Detwiller, and in 1955, at the age of 60, he married her. The Sews settled in an apartment in Palm Beach, Florida, where they lived a quiet, pleasant life. Bill seemed at last to have found the life that satisfied him.

But, unhappily, Laura Seward died in August of 1960, leaving Bill alone and lonely once again. Two years later, on July 4, 1962, he died suddenly, at the age of 67. With his death, a name that had distinguished the development of America passed into history.

From his youthful days as an ambulance driver, Bill Seward had shown a deep desire to help others. Because of his innate shyness, the chances of fulfilling that desire during his lifetime seemed to be few. But his will provided him with the opportunity he sought to share with others the abundance that had been his. Perhaps it was a measure of his shyness that, although all in his family knew him as William H. Seward IV, he used the less formal "Jr." in giving his name to his fund.

Cover: The Seward House at Auburn, New York.
Note: No photograph of William H. Seward IV was found available for publication.

The New York Community Trust is a publicly-supported community foundation which provides centralized management for many charitable funds. New York's major banks serve as trustees. Trustee for the William H. Seward, Jr., Fund is Morgan Guaranty Trust Company of New York.

The Swards of Auburn and
William Henry Seward IV
1895-1962

Founder of the
William H. Seward, Jr., Fund in
The New York Community Trust
909 Third Avenue
New York, NY 10022